Juliette's keen interest in camping and outdoor activities started at Camp Wilpen, her family's summer retreat in Maine. It was there that she discovered the importance of personal growth, self-reliance, and spending time in nature. These experiences laid the foundation for Juliette's later contributions to Girl Scouting.

In 1909, Juliette was exposed to Robert Baden-Powell's Boy Scouts movement during her travels abroad. Inspired by its principles of character development, physical fitness, and service, Juliette envisioned a similar organization for girls.

On March 12, 1912, Juliette officially founded the Girl Scouts of America (GSA). Starting with just 18 girls in Savannah, she quickly expanded the movement across the country with the help of dedicated volunteers.

Juliette's leadership style was characterized by her unwavering determination, infectious enthusiasm, and ability to inspire others. She believed that every girl deserved an opportunity to develop her full potential, regardless of her background.

Juliette was constantly innovating and evolving the Girl Scout program. She introduced a wide range of activities, including camping, hiking, swimming, and arts and crafts, to foster the physical, intellectual, and emotional growth of girls.

Juliette's influence extended beyond Girl Scouts. She was a prominent advocate for social justice and women's rights. She worked tirelessly to improve the lives of girls and women, both in the United States and internationally.

During World War I, Juliette organized Girl Scouts to participate in war relief efforts, such as sewing bandages and collecting food for soldiers. She also supported the passage of the 19th Amendment, which granted women the right to vote.

Juliette Gordon Low passed away in Savannah in 1927 at the age of 66. However, her legacy continues to resonate with millions of girls worldwide. Girl Scouts has grown into an international organization, empowering girls in over 150 countries.
