Alexander was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in 1856. He studied art at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts and at the Académie Julian in Paris. After returning to the United States, Alexander settled in New York City, where he quickly became a successful painter. He was elected to the National Academy of Design in 1890, and he served as its president from 1909 to 1915.

Alexander's Symbolist paintings are often characterized by their use of allegory and metaphor. In these paintings, Alexander used symbols to represent abstract ideas or emotions. For example, in his painting "The Eternal Silence" (1898), Alexander depicts a woman sitting on a rock in a desolate landscape. The woman is surrounded by symbols of death and decay, including a skull, a snake, and a broken hourglass. The painting is a meditation on the inevitability of death and the transience of life.

Alexander also used dreamlike imagery in his Symbolist paintings. In these paintings, Alexander created dreamlike worlds that are filled with strange and wonderful creatures. For example, in his painting "The Island of the Fay" (1897), Alexander depicts a group of fairies dancing on a moonlit island. The painting is a celebration of the beauty and mystery of the natural world.
